Summary of Request:

A key goal of any homeless program is lifting people toward self-sufficiency. Providing permanent housing to people experiencing homelessness is an approach backed by research, but equally important for some is the dignity that comes from hard work. Not every homeless person is positioned for employment today, but for some it is an appropriate path forward. The goal of this initiative is to give people an opportunity to earn an equitable daily wage, connecting individuals with supportive services, and providing homeless citizens an opportunity for employment instead of panhandling. This is a missing component of the spectrum of services we need to provide for folks dealing with homelessness. Homeless citizens face steep obstacles in securing employment. Whether hired on the spot to clear brush for government or facilitated to work a regular schedule under a public-private partnership with industry, hard work can be a pathway leading away from street living and off of permanent public assistance.
